Ian Hornby used to design computers for a living. When his favourite employers, Ferranti Computer Systems, went bust, he moved to Unilever Research for 6 years and then to a couple of small electronics companies before going freelance, training people to use computers, interleaved with writing.

He started writing plays in his early 40s and he still loves to write them today, in between trying to write novels and TV/radio scripts. He is a drama adjudicator for the Greater Manchester Drama Federation, chairman of the Bridgewater Players Dramatic Society and he runs the Playwright's Co-operative.
